CLARKE EASY MEAT FOR CHAMPION FRANK KRAMER

The Newark News says that Kramer had but little difficulty in winning from Jackie Clarke at Valesburg last Sunday in the match sprint race between the two. Outridden and out generaled, Clarke fell before the champion in two straight heats. The little Australian is said to have lost friends by some rough said to have lost friends by some rough riding. Holdup Picture in W. H. Bancroft's Office Had a Most Unique Origin.

In the private office of W. H. Bancroft, general manager of the Short Line railroad, is a picture that invariably arouses interest. It is entitled "The Footpad," and beneath it is an inscription showing that it was presented with the compliments of Robert Pinkerton of the detective agency. The striking feature of the picture is that seen from any point in the room the muzzle of the revoiver seems to be pointed directly at the spectator. The eyes of the robber, too, seem to follow one about the room, giving an eerie senone about the room, giving an eerie sensation that fixes the picture in one's memory indelibly. A great deal has been written about this picture and how to paint one like it, until nowadays any one at all versed in art can make a copy, but the origin of the picture has never been described in print and Pinkerton himself, who distributed it to his friends, does not know how it came to be painted, for the original was in oil, although the copies given by Pinkerton to his friends are big photographs.

given by Pinkerton to his friends are big photographs.

The original was painted in Spokane. Back in 1893 the present staid metropolis of eastern Washington was a lively camp where open gambling was one of the principal industries. The biggest gambling house in town, "The Owl," kept by the square gambler "Doc." Brown, handled more money than most of the banks. Its proprietor was a philanthropist in his way. He bought seals and put them in the Spokane river so the children could play with them and in many other unique ways endeared himself to the less prosperous portion of the community. One day, hearing that a family was in want down in a little shack not far from the Division street bridge, he went to investigate and found a young Polish artist and his wife actually in want of food. It was one of the gambler's cardinal tenets that everybody was entitled to enough to eat so he supplied them with provisions. eat so he supplied them with provisions. He visited them every day and soon became well acquainted with the artist. One day as the gambler was leaving the artist's wife said to her husband:

"Show him your picture."
The artist's face reddened and he said: "Oh, he wouldn't care for it. Besides, that's all over now. I'm going to destroy it."

This interested the gambler and with a tact for which he was famous he at length induced the artist to bring forth the picture.

It was the painting of "The Holdup," and the gambler fairly shivered as the gun muzzle and the eyes seemed to follow im about the room.
"However did you do that?" asked the

"That holdup is myself," answered the artist. "It is myself as I might have been had it not been for your kindness. my memory and would not go away ing over a man who had resisted robbery and whom I had killed. That picture is what deterred me until you came." "What will you take to paint the other picture?" asked the gambler, who was a noisseur of art as well as of the freaks of chance.

"I could not paint it. It would drive me crazy. It almost did so anyway," answered the artist and he stuck to this decision desplte offers of big sums. The gambler took the picture and hung it in The Owl gambling saloon just bet in The Owl gambling saloon just be ow the big tiger with gaping jaws which was supposed to be a warning to all entering the gambling hall. In a day the picture was famous. People felt the unexamy influence of those eyes and gumuzzle that seemed to follow them alsout the room. Then came the demans for copies and the young artist and hi wife were able to repay their benefactor He gravely rendered them an account of all he had advanced and then, after accepting it, wrote a check for many time cepting it, wrote a check for many times the amount in payment for the picture. He was a gambler, but that was his way. Perhaps it is why today he has a modest living from a small mercantile venture in Portland, Ore, with none of the hundreds of thousands that came and went through his hands.

Pinkerton found the picture in Spokane and got permission to have photographs made of it. These he sent to his friends, but neither he nor any others except a few who knew the gambler, ever learned how the picture was conceived.
